PREFACE

This study is the second in a series prepared in support of estimates on the state of relations between the People's Republic of China and countries in the Middle East/West Asia region, including selected African and South Asian nations. For purposes of comparison, and because several countries in the Middle East/West Asia region continue to maintain diplomatic relations with Taiwan, Taiwan's relations with the region are also addressed. The time period covered is 1 October 1983 through 31 December 1984. This volume updates the first issue (DDE-2200-211-84) published in March 1984 and covering the period 1 January 1979 to 30 September 1983.

This study is divided into four parts: an overview, a chronology of exchanges, statistical summaries based on the chronology, and a selected bibliography. The chronology, based on an online data base, consists primarily of exchanges of delegations, but such interchanges as sales contracts or important statements are also included when the absence of diplomatic activity conducted through established channels makes them significant. The 30 countries (plus the Palestine Liberation Organization, which is included in the total) are arranged geographically:

- o Africa-Horn
- o Africa-North
- o Arabian Peninsula
- o Levant
- o Selected South Asian countries
- o Southwest Asia

The information in the chronology was derived from a variety of open sources, the primary two being Xinhua (New China News Agency) reports from the Foreign Broadcast Information Service's Daily Report: China and the periodical China Aktuell published by the Institute for Asian Studies in Hamburg, Germany.

1. OVERVIEW

a. China

The Middle East/West Asia region is important to China both strategically and as part of its policy toward the Third World. China does not consider the countries of the region, with the possible exception of India, as direct threats or rivals, but rather is concerned with the area's potential as the site of a superpower conflict. Beijing also is concerned that Soviet expansion in the region would aid Moscow's long-term plans to encircle China and achieve global dominance. Several aspects of China's independent foreign policy line, which was proclaimed in 1981-82, have been evident in recent Chinese relations with this part of the world and include:

- o Chinese criticism of both United States and Soviet policies;
- o the renewal of Chinese contacts with Soviet-leaning governments such as Ethiopia; and
- o an emphasis on stability and world peace in order to pursue economic modernization.

China seeks to encourage regional stability and counter Soviet involvement in the Middle East and West Asia by emphasizing Third World solidarity and improving Chinese relations with almost all nations in the region.

Since late 1983, delegations exchanged between China and the Middle East and West Asia have been primarily economic and cultural in nature, continuing the post-Mao trend. Economic relations with the region have been affected by China's new domestic emphasis on economic modernization, which has led to a more pragmatic policy favoring joint ventures and business contracts rather than large concessionary grants.¹ An example of China's cultural relations with the region is its continued use of religious groups, especially the Chinese Islamic minorities, to forge links with the region.

Beijing's rivalry with Taipei for diplomatic recognition is less intense now that China has diplomatic relations with all but four countries in the region (Bahrain, Israel, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia) and only Saudi Arabia recognizes Taiwan. In 1984 China scored a rare if small success by establishing diplomatic relations with the United Arab Emirates (UAE), which previously recognized neither Taipei nor Beijing but allowed Taiwan to maintain an "honorary consulate" in Abu Dhabi.

A marked increase in Chinese arms sales has been the most significant new trend in Chinese relations with the Middle East/West Asia region during the October 1983 to December 1984 period. Evidence indicates that since the late 1970s, the Middle East has been an ideal market for China's sales of its "simple, sturdy, and cheap" weapons and provided China with much-needed hard currency. In exchange China has also received information on Soviet military technology from Middle Eastern countries such as Egypt and Iraq, including sample hardware such as MiG-23s, which has contributed significantly to China's modernization program. With regard to China's strategic interest in countering Soviet expansion in the Middle East, increased Chinese arms sales to this region, according to one observer, reflect a Chinese

... advantage regarding the Soviet Union, but it is equally obvious that one should not read too much into this advantage. In the first place, the Chinese deals have not met any serious Soviet response, let alone retaliation. On the contrary, it seems as if the Soviets tolerated or even approved the Chinese arms sales which alleviated the never-ending burden of their military supply to the Arabs, prevented a Western monopoly of the market, and helped maintain the infrastructure for future deliveries of more advanced Soviet weapons.³

(1) Africa-Horn

The majority of delegations exchanged between China and the Horn of Africa from October 1983 to December 1984 were economic in nature--trade protocols with Ethiopia and Sudan, loan agreements with Kenya, Somalia, and Sudan, and drought relief to Djibouti, Ethiopia, and Somalia. During this time period, at least one cultural delegation was exchanged between China and each of the countries in the region and the two political delegations exchanged were between the Central Committees of the Chinese Communist Party and the Somali Revolutionary Party. Although China is known to be a military supplier to Sudan and Somalia,⁴ no arms sales were reported during this time. The only reported military interaction was Sudanese President Gaafar Mohamed Nimeiri's meeting with Defense Minister Zhang Aiping during his 1984 China visit.

Beijing's relations with Sudan and Somalia continued to be cordial, while there was little interaction with Djibouti and Kenya and a slight improvement in Chinese relations with Ethiopia. China's close relations with Somalia and Sudan were marked by a 3-day visit to China by Somali Foreign Minister Abdirahman Jama Barre and a 5-day visit by Sudanese President Nimeiri, both in December 1984. During these visits, China may have sought to alleviate any anxieties Sudan and Somalia have had over China's recent efforts to improve relations with their common pro-Soviet neighbor, Ethiopia. Beijing has sought to ease its previously strained ties with Ethiopia through increased economic ties. An agreement on economic and technical cooperation was signed during the Ethiopian Foreign Trade Minister's April 1984 visit to China. January 1984 was the fifth anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the smallest nation in the region, Djibouti, but no high-level delegations were exchanged in the period under consideration. China seeks to maintain good relations with Kenya through economic and cultural ties. Minister of Communications Li Qing participated in Kenya's 20th anniversary independence celebrations and signed an interest-free loan agreement for approximately $7.5 million during his December 1983 visit to Nairobi. The loan will be used for one of China's favorite high-visibility Third World aid projects, a sports stadium.

(2) Africa-North

There were slightly more cultural than economic delegations exchanged between China and North Africa from October 1983 to December 1984. One cultural exchange was the Chinese Islamic Association's October 1983 tour of Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia, a typical example of China's efforts at using Islam as a political tool. Chinese economic relations with North Africa reflect a change in China's policy away from grant aid toward more mutually beneficial agreements which run the gamut from more traditional aid projects such as Chinese medical teams in Algeria and Libya, Chinese assistance for a Tunisian canal and a Libyan railway, to a joint fertilizer project with Tunisia with Kuwaiti funding, and a Chinese construction firm's first Egyptian contract for housing.

Egypt is one of China's long-standing friends in North Africa. High-level bilateral visits in 1984 featured National People's Congress Vice Chairman Wang Renzhong's January visit to Egypt, and Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Brutus Ghali's August China visit. Ghali's trip coincided with Egyptian President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak's visit to Nonaligned Movement leader Yugoslavia. Both trips were reportedly to discuss proposals to end the Iran-Iraq War.⁵ Egypt is also one of the Middle Eastern countries to which Beijing's arms sales have grown dramatically since the late 1970s. China is now Egypt's third largest arms supplier, following the United States and France.⁶ Chinese antisubmarine warfare vessels, antiaircraft guns, and ROMEO Class submarines reportedly were sold to Egypt in July 1984. Moreover, Cairo is reputedly one of Beijing's sources for information on and samples of Soviet weapons. Though no specific reports of Egypt's supplying China with technology or samples appeared during the late 1983 to December 1984 period, this could come to light at a later date after the technology has been absorbed by the Chinese. In November a Chinese military delegation attended the 1984 Egyptian defense equipment exhibition and visited several military establishments.

Following Egypt, the greatest number of delegations between China and North Africa during this period were exchanged between China and Tunisia. The two countries' foreign ministers made reciprocal visits in late 1983 and early 1984, Vice Premier Li Peng visited Tunis in May, and Prime Minister Mzali signed an economic and technical cooperation pact in Beijing in October 1984. In other parts of North Africa, delegations exchanged between China and Algeria were primarily cultural, although Chinese party, government, and military representatives attended the 30th Algerian Revolution anniversary celebrations on 1 November 1984. China continued its efforts to strengthen ties with Libya--part of Beijing's new flexibility toward Soviet client states. The first meeting of the Sino-Libyan Joint Committee on Economics, Trade, and Scientific and Technical Cooperation was held in November 1983, resulting in a Chinese agreement to aid Libya in the construction of the Tripoli-Ras Gader Railway. Vice Premier Li Peng paid a 3-day official visit to Libya in May 1984. During the October 1983 to December 1984 period, Morocco had the fewest delegations exchanged between China and a North African nation. The most significant exchanges were the November 1983 discussions on fertilizer cooperation and the August 1984 signing of a 3-year cultural executive plan. Unlike similar discussions on fertilizer cooperation held in Tunisia also in November 1983, the Moroccan discussions have yet to yield concrete results.

(3) Arabian Peninsula

China's relations with the Arabian Peninsula are primarily economic and cultural, including limited ties with nations with which Beijing lacks diplomatic ties: Bahrain, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia. In November 1984 China increased the number of its official contacts in the region by establishing diplomatic relations with the United Arab Emirates (UAE). In December 1984, a high-level financial delegation from the China International Trust and Investment Corporation visited Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, and the UAE. Bahrain has traded with China since 1956, although the two countries have no diplomatic relations. Chinese relations with Kuwait are perhaps the closest in the region. Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian visited Kuwait to discuss bilateral and international issues in April 1984, and both the Kuwaiti Amir and Crown Prince have reportedly accepted invitations to visit China at a later date. During the October 1983 to December 1984 period, China's relations with Oman were further strengthened by Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian's October 1983 visit, Special Representative of the Sultanate of Oman Thuwainy bin Shihab's 8-day official visit to China in July 1984, and Deputy Chief of General Staff of the Chinese People's Liberation Army He Zhengwen's December 1984 visit to Oman. The latter was the only reported military delegation between China and the Arabian Peninsula during the period. Beijing maintained relations with the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen and the Yemen Arab Republic through cultural exchanges and economic assistance such as Chinese medical teams and bridge construction in both countries. There were no reported exchanges between China and Qatar during this time period.

The major obstacle to expanded Chinese influence on the Arabian Peninsula is Beijing's lack of diplomatic relations with Saudi Arabia and Riyadh's close ties to Taipei. Saudi Arabia permits Chinese Muslim delegations to make annual pilgrimages to Mecca and in 1984 the pilgrimage delegation was feted at a state banquet by King Fahd. The most encouraging sign of closer China-Saudi relations was Saudi Prince Talal's announcement in August 1984 that he would visit China as a special envoy of the United Nations Children's Fund. Talal made the announcement at a press conference in New York with China's Permanent Representative to the United Nations Ling Qing, and both stressed friendship and respect between their two countries. Talal went so far as to compare the possible implications of his trip to the breakthrough the US ping-pong team made for US-China relations. But in November, he postponed the visit due to "pressing family circumstances." Although the visit reportedly was delayed rather than cancelled, it had not been rescheduled by the end of 1984. Saudi unwillingness to give up its close and profitable relationship with Taiwan and its firm anticommunism based on religious principles mean that progress in Sino-Saudi relations will most likely be slow and tentative.

(4) Levant

China's relations with the troubled Levant region are limited despite a high level of Chinese concern expressed in an abundance of Chinese statements on the Arab-Israeli conflict there. Beijing sees this region as well as the Iran-Iraq War in Southwest Asia as having the greatest potential for sparking a US-USSR conflict. Since the announcement of China's independent foreign policy line in the early 1980s, Beijing has begun to criticize the actions of both superpowers in this area. According to authoritative Chinese articles in late 1984, both the United States and the Soviet Union have recently launched new "offensives" in the region. The United States' effectiveness in achieving influence will be limited unless it corrects its bias toward Israel and accepts a fair and reasonable solution for Palestine. Moscow's attempts to control the region will be hampered by its desire to dominate the Arab people and its willingness to sacrifice Arab interests to reach compromises with Washington.⁷

Beijing consistently urges Arab nations to overcome their internal differences and solve their problems through Arab unity. To encourage this goal, China has fostered closer relations with moderate Jordan while maintaining rhetorical and material support for the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). Among the high-level visitors to Jordan in 1984 were NPC Vice Chairman Wang Renzhong in January, President Li Xiannian in March, Bank of China Chairman Bu Ming in July, and Deputy Chief of General Staff He Zhengwen in December. An unconfirmed report in March 1984 asserted that China had agreed to supply Jordan with arms and training.⁸ Press accounts of a Jordanian company signing a contract with China to build four nuclear power plants were denied by the Chinese Government, with a statement that negotiations had been held but were unsuccessful.⁹ China continued its support to the PLO through unspecified amounts of material assistance and numerous statements, often made by the Chinese Ambassador residing in, or Chinese leaders visiting Tunisia or Jordan. In May 1984, Beijing highlighted its support for Arafat by according him a 19-gun salute and audiences with top Chinese leaders, including Deng Xiaoping, during his visit to China. There was only one exchange between China and war-torn Lebanon, and three delegations between China and Syria. In December 1984, a cultural cooperation pact for 1985-87 was signed between Beijing and Damascus.

Israel is the only nation in the Levant region with which China does not have diplomatic relations, and China routinely condemns Israel's "policies of aggression and expansion" in the region. Although Israel would probably view improved ties with China favorably, China's desire to maintain good relations with the Arab states and thereby advance its Third World credentials precludes a change in Beijing's official posture toward Jerusalem. There are perennial reports of secret Sino-Israeli contacts. Moscow gladly plays them up for propaganda benefit, and some reports may be the products of Soviet disinformation.¹⁰ An increasing number of more credible reports in 1984, however, suggest the existence of some form of clandestine military relationship between China and Israel. Israeli-made cannons were viewed on Chinese tanks during China's 35th National Day parade in October 1984, evidence that Israel won out over Great Britain in a deal to modernize Chinese tanks with guns and fire-control systems. Israel has also been reported as the source for sighting equipment and gun turrets on T-34 and T-59 Soviet tanks and computers and other high technology, for deals worth over $3 billion. Israel may also provide China with information it garnered on the performance of Soviet-made weaponry during various Middle East conflicts. Another 1984 report that Israel is aiding China in developing chemical weapons seems more likely to fall under the category of rumor or disinformation.¹¹

(5) Selected South Asian Countries

Friendly ties between Bangladesh and China continued during the October 1983 to December 1984 period with a number of cultural, economic, party, and military exchanges. Commanders of the Navy and Air Force Liu Huaqing and Zhang Tingfa, respectively, visited Bangladesh in November 1983 and July 1984. The highest-level visitor from Bangladesh to China was Deputy Chief Martial Law Administrator Air Vice Marshal Sultan Mahmud, concurrently Chief of Air Staff and Minister of Energy and Mineral Resources, who visited in January 1984. Economic ties were furthered by the convening of the first session of the Joint Commission of Economic, Trade, and Scientific and Technical Cooperation, held in Beijing in September 1984, and a long-term trade agreement signed in Dacca in December.

Strained relations between China and India showed certain signs of improvement despite the continuing lack of definitive progress on the longstanding border dispute. More cultural delegations were exchanged between China and India than with any other country in the Middle East/West Asian region, indicating an effort on both sides to increase mutual understanding and goodwill. A Chinese Buddhist delegation visited in October 1984, a further example of China's use of religious groups to promote its diplomatic ends. NPC Vice Chairman and former Foreign Minister Huang Hua attended the Asian Forum of Parliamentarians on Population and Development which was held in New Delhi in February 1984 and extended his stay at the invitation of the Indian Government. In August 1984 an Indian trade delegation signed a trade agreement in Beijing--the first official agreement between the two governments since the resumption of the exchange of ambassadors in 1976.

The fourth and fifth rounds of Sino-Indian talks on the border question were held in October 1983 and September 1984, respectively. Although neither round produced a resolution, differences were reportedly narrowed during the 1983 talks and some unspecified common opinions reached during the "cordial, friendly, and frank" talks in 1984. During the most recent round of talks, negotiators discussed bilateral and international issues of common concern in addition to the border question. The Chinese Government responded to Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's assassination in October 1984 with "deep condolences" on the death of an outstanding statesman who made important contributions to Sino-Indian relations. Chinese Vice Premier and Special Envoy Yao Yilin attended her funeral, where he expressed hope for improved ties in his meeting with the new Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. Prospects for a resolution of the border issue and closer China-India relations are restrained by Beijing's military relationships with Pakistan and Bangladesh, New Delhi's relations with Moscow, and Sino-Indian rivalry for Third World and Asian leadership roles.

(6) Southwest Asia

China considers the Southwest Asian region, from Turkey to Pakistan, crucial to Moscow's southward expansionist strategy, which could lead to eventual encirclement of China. In this regard, Beijing continues to condemn the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, insisting it is part of the Soviet threat to Chinese security which must be removed before Sino-Soviet relations can be normalized. The "silver lining" of the Afghan situation may be threefold in the Chinese view:

- o it has the Soviet Army bogged down;
- o it has revealed Soviet military weaknesses;
- o and it has tarnished Moscow's image by showing its aggression toward an Islamic, Asian, and nonaligned nation.¹²

All publicized China-Afghan exchanges from October 1983 to December 1984 were made with Afghan refugees in Pakistan. Chinese medical and other relief aid was provided to the refugees. Moscow publicized accounts of Chinese weapons and training for the Afghan rebels which Beijing denied. In April 1984 the Soviet Union sealed the Afghan-Chinese border, supposedly to prevent Chinese supplies from reaching the rebels. Soviet accusations of Chinese military aid for the Afghans reached a crescendo in August 1984, coinciding with continuing Soviet criticism of Sino-Pakistani nuclear cooperation.

Pakistan is China's closest friend in the Middle East/West Asia region. Their relations are characterized by both the highest number of delegations exchanged and by far the highest number of military delegations. High-level visitors between late 1983 and the end of 1984 included President Li Xiannian in March 1984, Foreign Minister Yaqub Khan in July 1984, numerous military officials, and stopover visits by Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian in October 1983, Premier Zhao Ziyang in June 1984, and President Li Xiannian in November 1984. The importance of Islamabad was highlighted by the fact it was Li Xiannian's first stop on his first trip abroad after being elected President. In September 1984, Pakistani Chief of General Staff Lieutenant General Aslam Beg led the first military delegation to travel to China via the strategically important Karakoram Highway, jointly built by China and Pakistan. The most problematic aspect of Sino-Pakistani relations in 1984 was the controversy over possible nuclear cooperation which arose in March 1984 and continued to receive attention throughout the summer from Indian, Soviet, and US sources which accused China of aiding Pakistan in the development and underground testing of an atomic bomb. The specter of possible Chinese nuclear proliferation to Pakistan forestalled further progress on US-China nuclear cooperation in 1984, although President Ronald Reagan initialled a peaceful nuclear cooperation agreement with China during his late April 1984 visit to Beijing.

China's cordial relationship with Turkey continued to develop with official visits by State Councillor and Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian in March 1984, Minister of Foreign Affairs Vahit Halefoglu in October 1984, and Vice President of the ruling Turkish Motherland Party Halil Sivgin in November 1984. During his visit in October 1984, Halefoglu called Chinese-Turkish relations exemplary for countries with different economic and social systems.

China's concern with the Iran-Iraq War is to prevent the conflict's escalating to involve the superpowers and/or other countries, and to curtail opportunities for Soviet dominance in the region. China officially maintains strict neutrality in the conflict and appeals to both countries to seek a peaceful settlement. At a United Nations Security Council session in June 1984, China voted for the resolution condemning attacks on commercial ships in the Persian Gulf. In 1983 Chinese relations with Tehran began to improve after being strained due to Beijing's previous closeness to the Shah. A joint communique signed during Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian's official visit to Iran in November 1984 stressed both sides' interest in expanding future relations. Chinese economic cooperation with Iran includes support for the Isfahan Steel Plant and the Bafq-Bandar 'Abbas Railway. The number of Chinese exchanges with Iraq during the October 1983 to December 1984 period was slightly greater than those with Iran. In December 1983 Vice Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Tariq Mikhayl 'Aziz and Vice Chairman of the NPC Standing Committee Wang Renzhong visited each other's countries. China's economic relations with Iraq include China's largest contract in the Gulf region, the Kifil Shinafiya Irrigation Project, and large groups of Chinese factory workers employed in Iraqi textile mills. China viewed favorably the United States' resumption of diplomatic relations with Iraq in November 1984, with the hope it will "help bring an earlier end to the war."¹³

Despite China's officially neutral position on the Iran-Iraq War, many reports indicate Beijing has sold arms to both countries and may be involved in mediation efforts. The attrition of Soviet-made Iraqi weapons during the war and Moscow's reluctance to replace them provided China with a rare sales opportunity which, despite secrecy and firm denials, Beijing appears to have taken. Shipments are probably routed through Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt, and these countries may even have signed the contracts in Iraq's behalf, in order to preserve Chinese "neutrality."¹⁴ In 1983 there were reports that China sold Iran F-6/SHENYANG fighter planes through North Korean intermediaries. In February 1984 Beijing was reported to have dropped support of Iraq in order to conclude a secret $1.45 billion arms deal with Iran. However, the Chinese Government dismissed all these reports as "totally groundless" and incompatible with China's principled stand on the war. Beijing also denied it is involved in mediation efforts, despite occasional reports to the contrary, such as those surrounding Egyptian Minister Ghali's August 1984 visit to China.

b. Taiwan

Since Saudi Arabia is the only nation in the Middle East/West Asian region with diplomatic relations with Taiwan, Taipei's avenues for contact in the region are limited primarily to economic relations. Taiwan values its relations with Saudi Arabia more highly than its ties with any other nation with which it has diplomatic relations, the other two of importance being South Korea and South Africa. Highlights of Taiwan-Saudi relations between October 1983 and December 1984 were the May 1984 announcement that Saudi Arabia would increase oil exports to Taiwan, the May agreement by Saudi Arabia to finance Taipei's underground railway with an $80 million low-interest loan, and the August 1984 inauguration of the King Al Faisal Naval Base in Jidda which was built by Taiwan engineers. There are approximately 7,000 citizens from Taiwan working in Saudi Arabia in fields including medicine, agriculture, transportation, and communications.¹⁵ Like Beijing, Taipei emphasizes the importance of its Chinese Muslim minority and sends an annual pilgrimage delegation to Mecca. When the delegation met with King Fahd in August 1984, he effusively called Taiwan-Saudi relations the best between any two countries in the world.

Taiwan deplored the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the UAE in November 1984 but stressed that every effort would be made to maintain Taipei's close and friendly ties with Abu Dhabi. Taiwan also maintains unofficial and business links with other Middle Eastern nations such as Bahrain, Qatar, and Jordan. The most unusual and controversial of Taipei's exchanges with Middle Eastern nations with which it does not have diplomatic ties was the reported presence of privately contracted aircraft technicians from Taiwan to maintain Iran's F-4/Phantom fighter planes and C-130 transport aircraft.

2. CHRONOLOGY OF EXCHANGES: BY GEOGRAPHIC AREA AND CATEGORY

The following chronology, dealing with delegations exchanged between China and Taiwan and the Middle East/West Asia region during the period 1 October 1983 through 31 December 1984, is organized into six geographic areas:

- oAfrica-Horn
- oAfrica-North
- oArabian Peninsula
- oLevant
- oSelected South Asian Countries
- oSouthwest Asia

While most of the chronological entries are of formal delegations exchanged by China and Taiwan with various countries in the Middle East/West Asia region, other selected contacts have also been noted when considered significant. Delegations and interchanges have been categorized as one or more of the following:

- ogovernment (G)
- omilitary (M)
- oeconomic (E)
- ocultural (C)
- opolitical (P)
- oother (O)

The economic category includes medical, scientific, and technical exchanges, in addition to trade and loan delegations. Friendship delegations and groups of parliamentarians, journalists, and trade union representatives come under the "other" category. Political delegations are primarily party-to-party contacts, while cultural delegations include religious, sports, and educational groups, as well as performances and art exhibitions.

3. STATISTICAL SUMMARY

This section includes six summaries, by area and country, of the numbers and types of delegations exchanged between China or Taiwan and the countries or organizations in the Middle East/West Asia region.

The totals are based on the categorization of each delegation as either government (G), economic (E), military (M), political (P), cultural (C), or other (O). The last category includes parliamentary groups, trade union officials, journalists, friendship delegations, and groups which cannot be clearly categorized. When a delegation has a dual purpose, such as military-political, it is included under both the military and political category columns but counted only once in the total. In the time period covered by this study (1 October 1983 - 31 December 1984), there were 14 dual-purpose and 1 triple-purpose delegations. An example of a dual-purpose delegation is a government delegation visit during which an economic agreement is signed, considered both government (G) and economic (E).

A seventh table combines the statistics for each of the six areas under consideration and presents a summary for the entire Middle East/West Asia region.
